The Health of Women 2025 features an exciting day of cutting edge content, providing novel strategies for the complex care of women. This year's agenda was developed following our valued approach of addressing women's health across the life span with the challenges and nuances of sex and gender medicine addressed throughout the conference. This event caters to the learning needs of primary care physicians, nurse practitioners, nurses, physician assistants, pharmacists and other health care professionals focused on women's health in family practice, internal medicine, and obstetrics and gynecology.

Emerging Topics in Women's Health: Minding the Depression Gap

The Society for Women's Health Research (SWHR) is committed to making women's health mainstream by promoting research on biological sex differences and increasing awareness of health conditions and diseases that disproportionately, differently, or exclusively affect women. Depressive disorders – one of the leading contributors to disability – have a disproportionate prevalence and impact on women. Depressive disorders include both major depressive disorder (MDD) and persistent depressive disorder (dysthymia), and from 2015 to 2018, there were statistically significant increases in major depressive episodes among adolescent girls (ages 12-17) and young adult women (ages 18-25). This symposium will discuss the impacts of depressive disorders on women's health, with special emphasis on chronic depression, physiological sex differences in disease, and disparities in clinical care. Panelists will present strategies as to how research, clinical, and policy stakeholders can collaborate to address persistent research gaps, disparities, and unmet needs in treating depression in women. Attendees will then engage in Q&A with the panel to discuss approaches to improve mental health outcomes for women across the lifespan.
